It aimed at how a person's self-concept or self-image is known to affect his communication ability. The way we feel about ourselves has a direct bearing on how we communicate with others. People with good interpersonal skill tend to talk firmly, without a trace of hesitation and through a wide and flexible vocabulary; are likely to think well of others; will be inclined to feel comfortable with others they view as superior in some way; and perform well when being watched. They are not afraid of others reactions.
